James Brown didn't just sing, "I feel good." No.

He put all of his lung power into it, his entire being, the fire in his gut. It was, "I feeEEEEEEEEeeell good." Yes, the rhythm section and dance to his vocals alone. Even when he's not being funky, the same can be said for Leon's power in his voice, even when he is cooing, as on "Like Takin' Candy From a Baby." Triplet knows a song's nature when the singer can take the words and bring them to life. On paper, there's nothing poetic about "I feel good" in the mouth of James Brown, it has the weight of gospel.

And Triplet isn't reserved about expressing his emotions. On "So Sexy," you can feel the lust pouring from his mouth to the woman NOW. Yet there's nothing X-rated about it. Triplet comes from a generation of musicians where emotions were communicated without vulgar descriptions.

Preaching love and brotherhood may seem old-fashioned to some, but these are worthy, timeless messages. And when Leon and Triplet sing them, you can't help but feel good.

Actually, you will feeEEEEEEEEeeell good. Take it away, Leon.
